RELIGIOUS REDUNDANCIES

Dennis Gullede

Gregory Alan Tidwell makes an interesting point in his article, "Repetitious Redundancies" (Gospel Advocate, June 2007, p. 5). He speaks of "recurring, superfluous, redundant, and unnecessary repetitions" that creep unawares into our speech. For example, we often hear of an "unknown stranger." Are we to imagine a known stranger?

Religious people seem to be especially good at this sort of thing. Two examples are: "baptized Christians," and "believing Christians." Tidwell says, "Such unnecessary redundancy opens the door to the possibility of Christians existing without faith and baptism."

I could not help but think of a few other common religious redundancies. We hear of being "baptized by immersion." In reality baptism is immersion. Nothing else qualifies. It is redundant to speak of the "modes" of baptism. Baptism is its own mode (Colossians 2:12). It used to be popular to speak of "born again Christians." Such terminology conjures up the question of whether or not there are Christians who are not born again (1 Peter 1:23).

Other redundant phrases are perhaps more innocent in origin. We speak often of "undenominational Christianity." Is the way of Christ really anything else? Christianity predates Protestant denominationalism by fifteen centuries. We speak of the "New Testament church." Are we to imagine the church outside of the New Testament? Of course, we must go to the New Testament in order to learn about the church, how congregations are to be organized and how Christians must live.
